GZIP file of the software, for the entire test web site functionality, that is dated prior to the Critical Date. The functionality and features as of the date of that backup are substantially the same, web page per web page, as those of Exhibit A.

- 4. As of that date of the master file backup, the web site was under preliminary test to accept credit card transactions and produced an electronic record constituting a "commercial invoice", as that term is understood in the patent application. For testing purposes, the commercial invoice was printed from the electronic record established by operation of the web site; in a full commercial operation, it was then, and is now, intended that the electronic record would be routed as necessary to facilitate passage of the purchased goods to their destination.
- 5. I now address the specifics of the preliminary test web site, particularly in reference to the elements of pending claim 21. Initially the user is greeted with a welcome page pursuant to which the user can select a language (corresponding to element (a) of claim 21). Thereafter the user is prompted to choose a country pertinent to the language previously selected. In this example English-speaking countries are shown. As a result of selecting Great Britain, on the next page, the user is informed that the prices for the items listed will be shown in pounds (corresponding to element (b) of claim 21, namely selecting a currency).
- 6. The user is then provided with an index of products in the language selected by the user. In this example, the user selects pants, and on the next web page has an opportunity of selecting a pants items, including specifying a waist size and inseam size and a color. Owing to prior choices of the user, the prices are quoted in pounds. The price includes the cost of goods as well as to the shipping cost. From the description it can be seen that the pants originate in the United States and are understood to be shipped to the country specified by the user, in this case Great Britain, and so the shipping cost is computed at the significant sum of £18.86. On the next page it can be seen that the user has selected to add a unit of this item to his order. Following the addition of this unit to the order, on the pants screen, shown on the following page, it is indicated to the user that his cart contains one item. The user then goes back to the index of products, selects snack foods, and is shown a screen of snack food items. The user then selects on the next page Water Blanched Gourmet Peanuts. After selecting this item, on the snack foods screen, the user is informed that his cart now contains two items.

The user then proceeds to the checkout page where the selected items are listed as well as international freight charges. By this point, a number of processes have happened. First, the user has selected a product to be purchased, in this case, two products, in accordance with element (c). Also, databases have been accessed to obtain price information for the product to be purchased, and a product code for an international goods classification system pertinent to such product, and international shipping information (this last information from the international carriage company's software) to take the products via the carriage company from the United States to Great Britain (the steps occurring in accordance with element (d)). (In fact, examination of the URL at the bottom of the pleated pants screen, prior to ordering the pants, encodes the internal vendor number, the vendor's product number, and the last six digits reflect a Harmonized Tariffs Schedule (HTS) or international goods classification system for the item.)

Similarly, element (e), calculating costs involved in moving such product to said destination based upon said destination and such product, has also been performed, and total carriage company freight charges are shown on the checkout page. Also on the checkout page are shown the total charges for the transaction, reflecting element (f), determining a total cost of the transaction that includes a price of the product.

- 8. When the user clicks the "Complete Order" button, the user is then directed to the order form, where the user can enter name, address, shipping information if different, and, for example, credit card information, to permit acceptance of the order. When this information has been entered, the user can then click on the "Submit Order" button. This point in the process corresponds to element (g), receiving an order for such product thereby triggering an electronic process for confirming existence of available funds. In the case of a credit card order, the electronic process includes processing the order in the amount specified for payment by credit card. The final screen thanks the user for the order and informs the user that the order has been sent for processing. Part of that processing includes generation of a commercial invoice, first in electronic form, and then printed, as described above.
- 9. As to various representative dependent claims, the preliminary test system was implemented over the Internet (claim 22), and the currency selection process includes addressing pertinent exchange rates (claim 23). Similarly, the transaction is determined to be international (claim 24) by virtue of the location of the goods in relation to the country selected by the user, the shipping route calculation (claim 25) is handled by reference to the carriage firm using a "shipping lanes table" established in the preliminary test site prior to the Critical Date. With the device claims, the story is similar.
- Moreover, from a time prior to the Critical Date until after filing of the present patent application on December 27, 1997. I worked full time in further improving the invention which the preliminary test site implemented and in seeking pathways to commercialize this invention.
